Not illustrated. 1877 Excerpt: ...different prefixes and affixes, which also partly occur in the formation of stems and words, comp. aNn sibi voluit, desideravit, compounded of the reflexive prefix ta and the original root ab (in on voluit), bibi potuit from wa and kal, hul (in boba, bD), 3) through a pervasive analogy, which by the insertion of an auxiliary sound rendered the remainder of the monosyllabic roots similar to the others.--The comparatively infrequent Quadrilitera have likewise arisen from the trilateral roots partly through reduplication or affixion, partly through the mere decomposition of a double consonant as in DDIS decerpsit from DSD. Bickells Outlines. 4 selves, partly through seeming internal inflection, and partly through prefixes; 2) how these stems through the prefixes and affixes in the formation of words received a definite character as nouns and verbs. Finally another stratum, as it were, in this agglutinative process is formed by suffixion in the narrower sense i. e. through the annexation of the personal pronoun in an objective (accusative) or subjective (genitive) signification. . 61. In the primitive Semitic, although not in the Hebrew, comp. . 59, it was allowed, for the sake of euphony, to suppress the short vowel of a syllable on placing a prefix before it or an affix after it, unless two consonants would thus occur at the end of a syllable (. 30). We find, for example, in the formation of roots qatla together with qatala, in the formation of stems ma-qatala for ma-qatala and in the formation of words such feminines as qatal-ta together with qatala-ta, but always only qatla-ta, never qatl-ta. . 62. The form qatla, which has arisen according to . 61, together with its modifications qitla and qutla, can by
