Not illustrated. 1774 Excerpt: ... SECT II. Speculations on Opium, with Cases and Reflections. FROM the present use of opium, and its peculiar and sometimes opposite effects as a medicine, its modus operandi has given rife to a variety of theories, and excited inquiries respecting the matter upon which it is supposed to act. To investigate causes, is as natural to the mind of man, as to view the phenomena of nature; and can we imagine this propensity implanted in us, without some useful design? Or is it not, from a view of this kind, that the mind is supported under the tedious and laborious task of collecting facts? And while any one keeps within such bounds, as to forsake, alter, or establish his theory according to his facts, and not to wrest his facts to coincide with a favorite preconceived opinion; true philosophy will never be injured, nor the interests of medicine thereby neglected. It has been a received opinion, that a fluid is secreted in the brain, which is distributed by the nerves to every part of the body: but certainly this aqueous inelastic fluid, Boerh. instit. sect. 277, cannot be the vehicle of sense and motion (b); especially if we consider what the same illustrious writer afterwards observes, sect. 447, Nonne tibi clarum, materiam proximam nutritio nis esse humorem subtilissimum nerveum, five flumillimum? By some it has been urged, that this inelastic fluid may act as a medium of sense and motion, in a state of vapor: this, however, would infer, that the mobility of () Upon the velocity of sense and motion, see the computations made by different authors: Ess. sur le mecanisme des muse. p. 93 Sauvages de la fievre, p. 392.
