

A New Spanish Grammar: Adapted to Every Class of Learners (Classic Reprint)

Excerpt from A New Spanish Grammar: Adapted to Every Class of Learners Again is the author of this grammar called upon to acknowledge his gratitude to the American public, for the distinguished patronage extended to his feeble efforts. The consciousness of having been induced in all his literary labours by no other view than that of being useful to a-country from which he has received the greatest testimonials of esteem and hospitality, is to him a greater reward, than all the advantages usually derived from the most successful productions. With these sentiments, neither approbation, nor censure has ever had any other tendency in his mind, than that of endeavouring, by research and study, to render this, and other works more and more practically useful. In regard to this grammar, he has only to say, that every succeeding edition from the publication of the first, bears ample testimony to what is now advanced. It had always been the intention of the author to offer the public a classic as well as a school book. But owing to a multiplicity of conflicting circumstances, it has only been accomplished in this fourth edition-how well the public must judge. No rule subject to contrariety of opinion has been left unsupported by one or more quotations of some author, generally acknowledged to be classic.
