1. Lajtouaoc is the principal vehicle of thought; and so nomeroas and important are the ends to which it is subservient, that it is difficult to conceive in what manner the affairs of human society could be conducted without it. I ts utility, therefore, will ever entitle it to a considerable share of attention in civilized communities, and to an important place in all systems of education. For, whatever we may think in relation to I ts origin whether we consider it a special gift from Heaven, or an aoqai8iti mof industry a natural endowment, or an artificial invention, certain it is, that, in th present state of things, our knowledge of it depends, in a great measure, if not entirdy, on the voluntary exercise of our faculties, and on the helps and opportunities afforded us. One may indeed acquire, by mere imitation, such a knowledge of words, as to eioy the ordinary advantages of speech; and he who is satisfied with the dialect he has so obtained, will find no occasion for treatises on grammar; but he who is desiroos either of relishing the beauties of literary composition, or of expressing his sentimenta with propriety and ease, must make the principles of language his study.

2. It is not the business of the grammarian to give law to language, but to teach it, agreeably to the best usage. The ultimate principle by which he must be governed, and with which his instructions must always accord, is that species of custom whleh critics denominatc good use ;that is, present, reputable, general use. This principle, whidi is equally opposed to fantastic innovation, and to a pertinacious adherence to the quaint peculiarities of ancient usage, is the only proper standard of grammatical purity. Those rules and modes of speech, which are established by this authority, may be called the Instit(Typographical errors above are due
