

German medical literature, he found but little assistance from dictionaries. As the Germans have no medical dictionary corresponding to Dunglison, and many of the definitions given in the ordinary dictionaries are erroneous, he was in the habit of writing down the technical words encountered in reading, with their meaning when this could in any way be ascertained. The manuscript at last became so voluminous as to be inconvenient, and it was then determined to have it printed, for the authors convenience and for the assistance of other students. Though interested mainly in the literature of the eye and ear, the authors reading has been quite general, and the technology of the several branches of medicine will be found well represented. It is possible, as the author is not a German, that various errors have escaped his attention, that some important words have been overlooked, and that material improvements can be made in a future edition. Suggestions as to such improvements will be very thankfully received. (Typographical errors above are due to OCR software and dont occur in the book.)
